MFRL Service in Uncertain Times

As I write in September 2025, the question I hear most from library patrons and others is how the library expects to proceed through the next five years or so with the current unprecedented changes in funding from federal government sources. There is no doubt that the parts of the federal government that provide funding to library, and also to many of our community partners, have gone through changes this year. Libraries are good at weathering social and political changes, and I hope to share with you why that's so, as well as what we expect at MFRL as far as funding in the next few years.

In truth, the nature of public libraries in the United States has always been locally based. From the first public library in the U.S. started by Ben Franklin in 1731, to today, most public libraries are governed, funded and managed at local levels. The section of the Virginia Code that authorizes local governments to operate libraries is about as general as can be – it doesn't tell local jurisdictions how to operate libraries, but rather provides a framework. And it's never been a better time to be under the control of persons in the local community.

Not only is the management of libraries “quarantined” from federal government control in Virginia, but funding is as well. In the past fiscal year, 80.5% of MFRL's funds were from our two local counties, Montgomery and Floyd. State aid made up an additional 13.5% of the budget, with donations, grants and funding from towns making up most of the rest. Federal assistance through the e-rate program was only $13,680 – about .5% of the budget.

So the changes in federal funding are not anticipated to have a direct effect on our budget in the foreseeable future – as Uncle Sam really never funded us much to begin with. The two problems that can be anticipated due to the DC changes are (1) changes in our local funding due to changing economic factors and (2) how changes in federal funding will affect our partnering institutions. I don't know that I am the one you turn to for overall economic forecasts, but I do trust the Supervisors in Floyd and Montgomery to fund our operations as fully as their resources allow, even if times get tighter.

The current environment for federal grants and programs, however, presents serious challenges to our valued partners, from Literacy NRV to Virginia Cooperative Extension. We have already seen some partners go completely dark. Virginia's STACC program, which supplied over 50,000 free COVID test kits to MFRL for distribution, ceased operations; as did VCU's Virginia Adult Learning Resource Center. Smaller grants to Virginia Cooperative Extension, Agape Center and New River/Mt. Rogers Workforce Development Board have disrupted their abilities to work with us on programming, free fridges, resource sharing, and other activities. To say that we and others in the NRV feel a bit uncertain about how grant cuts and the economy will affect large enterprises in the NRV – including Virginia Tech – is an understatement.

So while I always like to end my articles on a positive note, I feel like the honest way to end this one is with some uncertainty. MFRL and its staff will always put our patrons and community at the center of what we do. Administration at all levels – branch, library, county – understands that to be effective, we must find a way to provide the tools and resources the folks on the front need to provide exceptional service. Local control of libraries helps us in that mission a great deal. Library staff are great at many things, but one thing they are not good at is giving up. We aren't giving up now.

Pavilion at Jessie Peterman Memorial Library

The Pavilion at the Jessie Peterman Memorial Library will be completed in time to appreciate the fall colors in the trees surrounding this awesome outdoor space. The Floyd County Library Building Fund began fundraising for this project in October 2023. Community support has been strong from the start, and the project has received many generous donations from individuals, businesses, and local organizations. The Floyd Friends of the Library showed their support by selling t-shirts and tote bags with a lovely Pavilion design.

After a ground-breaking ceremony in April, construction got under way in early June and Omnibuild General Contractors maintained a steady pace throughout the summer.

This 850 square foot structure will provide the library with an outdoor space for programming, which it never had before. It will also give the community and visitors a place to sit and enjoy nature. Nestled against the side of a hill, it looks out over a small creek and wetland area and is surrounded by a variety of trees. It will be a perfect setting for programs of all types and everything from Storytimes to concerts are being planned. Please join us for light refreshments and a ribbon cutting on the Pavilion to celebrate all the hard work of the Floyd County Library Building Fund and the generosity of our community that made this amazing addition to the library possible! The Pavilion Ribbon Cutting is Friday, October 17th at 4pm.
